Tumors involving the third cranial nerve and/or the abducens nerve and/or the medial longitudinal fasciculus cause symptoms of cranial nerve III and VI palsy. In most patients, the lesion is located in the brainstem where there is a good surgical accessibility. However, it may be difficult or impossible to operate on these lesions for the following reasons: (1) To avoid exposure of the brainstem, (2) to avoid brainstem herniation after operation, and (3) to avoid postoperative hemorrhage. The present study assessed the clinical outcome of a paramedian microneurosurgical decompression of the third cranial nerve and the abducens nerve. Surgical results were assessed in 11 consecutive patients. The mean follow-up period was 39 months (range, 13-71 months). A complete or partial recovery was seen in 9 (81.8%) patients. The only case of deterioration was that of a 49-year-old woman with a neurogenic tumour of the posterior fossa. After 17 months of follow-up, she showed progressive deterioration of motor function. The lesions were located in the medial lemniscus in six patients (54.5%), the lesser petrosal nerve in four patients (36.4%), and the medial longitudinal fasciculus in one patient (9.1%). We conclude that a paramedian microneurosurgical decompression of the third cranial nerve and the abducens nerve can be achieved safely and effectively.Unions say Opel will run out of money in less than a month - unless they agree a new car deal with GM by then The carmaker warned it will run out of money in a matter of weeks unless it is permitted to stay in the three-way tie-up with Tata Motors and France's PSA. The Opel union said the three-way partnership "needs a fair and constructive offer from the two remaining partners". "
