Angiotensin-induced  $\text{Ca}^{2+}$  release from cardiac sarcoplasmic reticulum vesicles. Angiotensin II at high concentrations (100 nmol/l) caused a concentration-dependent release of  $\text{Ca}^{2+}$  from vesicles isolated from rat cardiac sarcoplasmic reticulum, with a high affinity component of action. The  $\text{Ca}^{2+}$  release mechanism was not affected by  $\text{Ca}^{2+}$  as well as by pretreatment with different agents, which have been reported to affect  $\text{Ca}^{2+}$  release in cardiac sarcoplasmic reticulum. The observed  $\text{Ca}^{2+}$  release is not likely to be mediated through a membrane perturbation by the angiotensin II, since equilibrium binding of [ $^3\text{H}$ ]sarcoplasmic reticulum  $\text{Ca}^{2+}$ -transport ATPase and ATP-dependent  $\text{Ca}^{2+}$  uptake in the presence of EGTA were not affected by angiotensin II. Instead, the observed  $\text{Ca}^{2+}$  release is attributed to a non-oxidative  $\text{Ca}^{2+}$ -release mechanism, which is readily reversible. It is suggested that the  $\text{Ca}^{2+}$  release by angiotensin II is a "fast" component of the contractile process in heart, which plays a role in the short-term regulation of contractile force.

Shock and Dagger Shock and Dagger is a 1938 American comedy crime film directed by William Dieterle and starring Don Ameche, Irene Hervey and George Coulouris. Two American secret agents are found drunk at a French railway station in the wake of a double murder. They claim to have been on a mission to expose a conspiracy to assassinate the Pope
