Service and the introduction of chaperoned orders and reflex testing in the use of serum samples for clinical chemistry testing on the workload and turnaround time in a biochemical laboratory. A biochemical laboratory was queried as to the effect of the introduction of two options for sample management within the laboratory on the workload and turnaround time. In the first option serum samples are collected from patients either as unsecured (sealed) samples (control), or chaperoned samples. The patient is identified by means of a unique identification number (ID number) on the envelope on which the specimen is sealed. These sealed specimens are sent to the laboratory in a sealed courier envelope which is subsequently opened and the specimen subsequently placed in a designated container for analysis. In the second option serum samples are now collected without the associated ID number and sent to the laboratory in sealed courier envelopes. The ID number is then applied to the individual specimen container after analysis has been requested. The effect of these options has been analysed as has their effect on turnaround time. Data were also obtained on the time taken for the completion of blood collection, time taken for sample analysis, the time taken for after analysis the result of the analysis and the total turn-around time for samples collected through the two options. Data were compared for the three calendar years in which the change of policy was implemented. Changes in staffing levels were taken into account by statistical adjustment. Turnaround time was significantly reduced (p<0.05). The following is an editorial piece by TCATSU. There's been a rash of highly critical articles about the "Return of the Buh," but the following story provides evidence that Michael McDowell's iconic moniker has been dead wrong all along.
