The tabs are black as far as I can recall. I could check if I am wrong though. "" Genetic contributions to critical period deficits in rats and patients with amblyopia. In normal vision, ocular dominance specificity in primary visual cortex is turned off during the critical period, enabling the critical period to be active only for a fraction of time. The molecular mechanisms that enable the critical period to be active only for a fraction of time are not well understood. However, therapies targeting the critical period are being actively investigated for clinical treatments of amblyopia. These therapies would have to be careful to limit their effects on the critical period to only a very limited time, and thus this regulatory mechanism must be reversible. It is not known, however, how the critical period can be turned off once it has begun. We sought to understand the molecular mechanisms that regulate the critical period and determine the extent to which these mechanisms are similar across species. Critical period initiation, which was consistently observed in rats and ferrets, was significantly reduced in rats after a 1-hour monocular block during b7e8fd5c8
