When I first started working on Sovietpunk, I was thinking about the stories of the post-apocalyptic genre. I really like them, but they always seem too clean and developed, and the characters always seem too perfect. You know what, I don't want to jump right into the story, I want to get to know some of the characters first. First, I need to get to know the state of the Lower Level, and I want the player to understand the state of the world. I want to know how the people live in the Lower Level, as well as what their daily lives are like. How do they fight for survival? It seemed to me that in such a complex world, it's difficult to find answers without a really close investigation. I decided that first of all, I needed to spend time in the Lower Level, so I would be able to really understand the realities of this world. The main character will take a trip underground with a reason. I need to take into account such a decision, and therefore I wanted to start the story with a trip underground. First, the main character goes to the Lower Level for the first time to look for something, and just by going underground, they will learn something about the culture there. The main character won't only go underground with a purpose; he will go underground because he wants to find out about the Lower Level. The first thing he will find, is that the government has a lot of secrets, and that the residents of the Lower Level are not as perfect as they seem. Playing The Game Sovietpunk: I worked on the basic idea of the game for about two years, and then I started my research by searching for "uncommon events" in the Soviet Union, where the main event took place. These events helped me to understand the social structure of the Soviet Union after the nuclear war and gave me data to expand the list of the company's paradoxes. The official title of the game is "Sovietpunk". The name implies the start of the game about two decades in the future, but the completion of the game is not fixed at all. The idea of the game is to deliver an interesting adventure that contains twists. The places where the game takes place are all in the Lower Level of the Soviet Union, and they will be familiar to fans of the genre. The city life doesn't exist in the Lower Level, and as a

Pew! Pew!" a child's voice howled, echoing throughout the streets of Seward Park. A small group of boys gathered around a group of other boys, pointing and laughing. Three of the younger boys ran away in fright, giggling all the while. "This little brat is going to get himself into something," one said to the others. Ryuji, Iceman, Finn, and Aquaman were standing nearby, watching the scene unfolding. "Hey, you kids," a policeman yelled, his voice thick with apathy. As if on cue, two teenage girls began to negotiate peace from the group. "Finn, your way," the voice commanded; the girls walked away. "I'm not signing anything," Finn said. "What are you gonna do about it?" A large boy stepped forward, a few inches higher than the others, with huge biceps nearly bursting from his skin. He had black hair, a red Detroit Pistons baseball cap, and a black eye. "If we behave, the police will go away," a man in a business suit said to the boys. "What are you talking about?" Finn asked, his voice the most balanced. "How are you going to go away? You're standing right in front of us. Besides, we're hardly children." "Sure," the boys laughed. "You're going to replace us as a gang." "Hey!" Iceman blurted. "I don't know what you kids are talking about. If any of you assholes gets mouthy, I'll see you on the sidewalk." "Oh, just shut up," the man in the suit said. "What are you gonna do?" one of the kids asked. "Just give you something to remember me by," the man said, glaring at the boys. The boys quickly scattered, save for a young man dressed in a red, green, and white jersey. "Wait up, U2," a young boy called out. "Hey, I was looking for you," Kevin offered.

The game has a retro style that is no doubt reminiscent of your favorite Nintendo or PlayStation game. And the retro style goes further than just the graphics and sound. For example, while driving the car you would never break the invisible barrier that forms in front of you. You would never be able to back over anything that you could see and use a meter in a way you wouldn't expect it. Instead you would just glide through the line. It is difficult to explain further without making it sound too much like a driving game. Contents There are five characters with which you will engage in 4 types of combat. Rifle Gun In this mode the goal is to kill as many enemies as possible in a short amount of time by swiveling around as many of the innocent enemies that you can. You are essentially playing a version of sniping with a high degree of accuracy. If an enemy is selected with your weapon you can press a button to shoot at them if you get a chance. Combat Mode This mode is the same as the one where you use a sniper rifle, but when an enemy is selected they are pinned to the screen and it is more difficult to get a good shot because it's not as clear where they are in relation to you. Raid Mode In Raid mode you will only be given two weapons, one is a melee weapon and the other is a ranged weapon. There is no scope so you have to think where you are going to use it since you cannot tell where enemies are in relation to you. Cloak and Dagger You cannot use your weapon until the enemy is selected and then you can only take so long to be used. A problem this mode solves is that you always want to shoot at the same enemy that is attacking you. To solve this problem you can tell your partner to guard the environment (a small square on the map). If this enemy comes close enough you and your partner will change positions and he will guard that area. A map will be displayed in the bottom left corner, and will show where the partner is guarded. Also in the map is a radar that indicates where there is an enemy. Your partner has to guard this radar if he wants to defend you. Your weapon will deal less damage when the radar is in another location and
