What's new in Insomnia Jigsaw:

Puzzles To the uninitiated, the name “insomnia jigsaw puzzles” might conjure up ghastly images of your paper and chipped wooden puzzle box crammed full of viciously piranha-like pieces hurtling up at you, saliva dripping from tired, stressed out lips, and a desperate desire to pluck them from the jaws of death before they can swivel round and sink a knife into your jugular. Not the case at all, however. Insomnia might be a nightmare, but at the same time, it’s apparently quite a popular pastime. In fact, a lot of people prefer to imagine tortuously horrible, soul-destroying things when they go to sleep, thinking that their pain will help them sleep. It’s a bastard of a thing. Many tend to prefer jigsaw puzzles to books, as they provide the opposite effect when it comes to trouble. Fans enjoy a new, exquisite, hypnotic, perfect jigsaw puzzle as they find themselves transfixed, alive to the building process as each piece is assembled with surgical precision, completing a shiny, sparkly, cratered skin around the piece of the puzzle’s agonised victim. All that matters, is their affection for the horrid, seemingly inhumane, flawlessly implemented and medicated tortures that the figure on the object is enduring. Each jigsaw is another chance to solve a mystery, with a large grin pasted on the face of each single person who dares to witness and participate in the bloody spectacle; in their minds, they’re the victims. (What a brilliant idea!) We got to talking about shite insomnia, and we’re really, really glad we did. Insomnia is, unfortunately, a fairly big thing. It stands to reason that a lot of people suffer from this disorder - why else would most of us be awake at strange times of the night, with hapless smiles on our faces and hundreds of millions of things to do just metres away? It’s likely that a few pretty, interesting and huge policy issues could be solved if some sleepless scientists would put their clever minds to the process, but enough about the likes of Elon Musk. On rare occasions, you might be your normal, peckish, stomach grunting self, finding yourself outside at 9am, after a night of drunken prayers with the Cerberus codes and the knowledge that if you ever took your eyes off your phone

Samuel Corbin, a U.S. intelligence specialist, was also accused of lying to the FBI about his conduct. The accusation came as a U.S. Army Major was charged with possessing classified secrets that he intended to disclose to an overseas organization in support of a foreign government. Kevin Mallory, of Washington, has been charged with possession of secret national defense information. After stealing a classified Army intelligence report on China's military, the 31-year-old Mallory was arrested in
