US stockmarket's spike was just "irrational exuberance", economists say Irish Independent Mon, Oct 10, 2012, 13:00 The rise in US stocks was nothing more than what the economists call "irrational exuberance", an exuberance of confidence during "outrageous" valuations. The stock market's rise over the last year would not have been possible had it not been for a confident consumer to buy and spend, said analysts with investment bank Deutsche Bank. "We're talking about... a sentiment event," Deutsche's chief strategist Christian Sewing said. "The market rose to the point where valuations... where people, pension funds, you name it, were saying, 'Okay, the market looks pretty cheap.' So they took that risk and they bought. The classic irrational exuberance story." The US stock market rise over the last 12 months would have been impossible had it not been for consumer confidence, Deutsche Bank's chief strategist Christian Sewing believes. In the US, the consumer confidence index rose to an 18-year high during the first quarter of this year and
