the project has been a success and the infrastructure has been continuously reinforced to serve as a model for the northeast leg of the A-train. The A-train, which began construction in November 2012, uses the same tunnels and architecture as the original R-1 and R-2 lines in the St. Paul area. Another significant change to the future A-train structure includes an increased train frequency, increase of 250% to 700 buses a day, and two new train stations. The A-train project has a projected opening date of late 2015, an estimated \$5 billion cost, and 800 full time jobs once the final trains are deployed. For more information about the A-train, visit and of peripheral blood progenitor cells mobilization centers. Our experience with peripheral blood progenitor cell (PBPC) mobilization offers useful data to answer the question: does the frequency of mobilization significantly differ from one center to another? We collected and reviewed the results of PBPC apheresis performed in five different hematology-oncology centers, coordinating the study and using the same protocol (the only difference is the center) in order to obtain an homogeneous group of patients. Eighty-three mobilization procedures were performed, 75 being harvesting procedures and eight being aplasia-inducing therapy. The median total mononuclear cell count was  $5.6 \times 10^{10}$  cells/l. Leukocytosis (greater than  $10 \times 10^9$  leukocytes/l), was present in 45 (53%) patients. The difference in blood counts during the three study time phases (pre-therapeutic, therapeutic and post-therapeutic) did not reach statistical significance. The collection rate (RR: rate of harvest from peripheral blood) was 49%; the other 51% of harvested blood was obtained from the central vein. The mobilization rate (RR) was 55%. The mean CD34+ cells/kg of mononuclear cells was significantly higher in harvesting procedures ( $5.8 \times 10^6$ ) than in mobilization procedures ( $1.8 \times 10^6$ )  $P = 0.005$ . The mean number of mobilization procedures per patient was 3.2. The mean time to complete
