Download movies instantly from a wide selection of File Archive. imdb downloader mistermovie.co.Uk!One of the first problems we encountered with a new OS is setting up wifi for external devices. Of course you can configure the router to forward to IP, but hey its a router not a snow plow. We discovered there are three options with Linux: the old way of using static IP, the new way of using DHCP and finally the new way of using IF: Network Interface Control. The idea with static IP is that the external device is given a static IP so it always has that IP to reach the router. For example 192.168.1.100. This is exactly what you get with windows and previous versions of Android. Linux is a bit different as it wants to use your ethernet card to find the IP so its the card connected to your WAN port on the router that gets a fixed IP address. To fix this we enabled wifi-ifupdown. If you do that it will use the wifi interface to find a DHCP server and then assign it an IP. If you don't have a wifi interface (like in headless machines) it will proceed to the next step and try to assign an IP to your ethernet interface. Unfortunately this has it's own little problems. To start if you are on a headless machine you have to manually start the service which is not something you want to have to do. If you are connected to a network that is not on the same subnet as the raspberry pi you have to set the IP manually, which adds complexity (see below). With wifi
