Hormone replacement therapy is a type of treatment for women (and men) who are menopausal (perimenopausal) or post-menopausal (peri-menopausal) and experiences negative symptoms of their hormone imbalance, such as hot flashes, night sweats, mood swings, among others. Hormone replacement therapy is also used to treat menopausal symptoms such as hot flashes, depressed mood, sleep disturbance, and memory loss. Hormone replacement therapy is typically administered through the skin through the use of a transdermal patch, which is designed to deliver small, constant doses of a hormone into the bloodstream of a user in an effort to remedy the underlying cause of the condition being treated. When prescribing hormone replacement therapy through the use of a transdermal patch, the doses are typically designed to be quite small so that the patient is not overdosed with hormones. Further, the duration of the therapy is typically designed to be quite short in order to minimize the risk of side effects associated with large doses of hormones. Accordingly, the patches are typically worn for a total duration of one month at a time. However, if the patch is removed during its one-month duration, it must be replaced immediately in order to avoid a loss of efficacy. In other words, a patient desiring to use a drug or treatment for a period of one month will have to wear a patch for the entire month. The foregoing example of a hormone therapy patch is not the only example of patient compliance for long-term therapeutic administration. For example, patients often use hormone therapy patches for a period of one year or more. However, with long-term use of a hormone therapy patch, a patient will inevitably remove the patch from their skin, thus exposing the patch and the underlying skin to potential side effects. For example, if a patch were to be worn over a period of one year, the patient would likely experience up to one year of constant exposure to the patch and its associated hormones. Such constant exposure can result in the growth of scars, calluses, increased sensitivity, and the like. As another example, patients often use hormone replacement patches for a period of one month to one year or longer, such as from 7 to 9 months. Typically, patients use the patch up to the end of a typical month-long period of hormone therapy and continue to use the patch beyond the typical one-month period until an endocrinologist or endocrinologist's physician reassesses the need for continued hormone administration. For example, if a patient stops
