Note Photoshop can create a new image on top of an existing image, but you can't move an image from one Photoshop document to another. That's one of the limits of layers. To start working with a photograph, simply open your photo by double-clicking the file in the Photoshop window. This command opens the file in the current _active_ Photoshop document. You can switch to another document by clicking the Tab key. Figure 1-3 shows a photograph of a friend of the author—Caroline. Click the New Layer icon to add a new layer above the image and duplicate it. 1. Open the New Layer icon (see the next page), click the Add Layer Mask button in the Layers panel, and then click on the image to the left. When you click the New Layer icon, you see the dialog box shown on the left in Figure 1-4. The dialog box opens to the Layers panel, which lists the files in your current active document. Double-click the image layer to open it in the window. As you add new layers on top of the existing layers in an image, each layer is displayed in a different color. The new image will inherit the colors of the layers below it. In Figure 1-4, a new layer is currently in the process of being created on top of the existing image. Figure 1-4.

Posts Tagged 'Social Psychology' By William Butler, PhD (University of Alabama, 2009) Daniel Kahneman has won the Nobel Prize in Economics for his work in behavioral economics. The Man Behind the Mind (Dirk Gently's Holistic Detective Agency, p. 137) reveals a picture of the economics profession's great minds in most of the major fields, including psychology, engineering, sociology, anthropology, mathematics, chemistry, and economics. Kahneman's research has yielded practical applications in environmental law, politics, the military, education, business, and marketing. Why do people act irrationally? The findings of this comprehensive survey of the field's key findings are surprising and powerful. The economics profession has a clear and simple view of how people and firms actually behave. According to the economists, rational actors should respond to incentives and the costs of behaving irrationally are great. Yet we discover that people ignore incentives and act irrationally, even when the costs are borne by themselves. Economists also believe they know what people value and, more importantly, how they value things. But in most cases, they do not know. Marketers know which messages will work best, but there are no reliable ways to know what people think of the messages they receive. Nor are there reliable methods to estimate the effect of "traditional" marketing messages on consumer behavior. In my experience, I have seen a great deal of irrational consumer behavior and marketers' ineffective responses to these behaviors. Consumers often persist in behaving irrationally simply because marketer's blithely assume that these irrational behaviors are the behavior of irrational consumers. Physicists and economists are continually perplexed by the fact that people have no basis for evaluating what they value. People do not evaluate the cost-benefit ratio of buying a house. They do not make money any more difficult than they should by choosing to receive a rebate from an insurance company. It is natural, then, that people make rational decisions on the basis of their mood, and in order to get people to act rationally, we should study their moods. Most of the success of this survey depends on a presentation to scientific principles and a surprising conclusion to the reader. The idea that a product is good is dependent on something that the reader does not suspect – the belief that it is "expensive." By comparing the products evaluated and

Q: Prove that $\left(1 + \frac{1}{p}\right)^x \equiv 1 \pmod{p}$ How would one prove that for $x > 0$ $\left(1 + \frac{1}{p}\right)^x \equiv 1 \pmod{p}$ for p a prime (e.g., $p \equiv 1 \pmod{4}$)? I cannot think of a way to do this without using the binomial theorem so can anyone help? Thanks. A: If $x \equiv 1$, then $\left(1 + \frac{1}{p}\right)^x \equiv 1 \pmod{p}$. Now that we've seen more of the new Battlefield II gameplay, we've got a good glimpse of how it'll play through to the end. This includes a more in-depth look at the usual Starfighter gameplay that EA's Battlefield II is known for. To that end, the game's creator, DICE, released a new development diary video featuring a collection of new gameplay snippets, including an overview of the game's new G-Man Death Star mode. In addition, the developers also gave a shout out to the tank and AT-TE as the mainstay of Star Wars gameplay in general. The latter has also been known to survive a lot of hits, but the former... Well, we'll get back to that. Of course, some new features were also added in the new mode, such as the ability to build your own Death Star. You can take that as an indicator of how much work DICE put into developing this new one. With that being said, the developers are also very keen
