We investigated contractile and inotrophic effects of acetylcholine and thromboxane on isolated rat airway strips during a chronic inflammatory lung disease caused by low-level aerosol exposure to asbestos, as compared with the effects in normal rats. The apparent maximal contractile response to acetylcholine was reduced (58 +/- 4% decrease) in the strip from As-exposed rats. The apparent maximal response to acetylcholine was increased in the strip from normal rats and was not changed in the strip from As-exposed rats. Thromboxane B2, a potent contractile stimulus, was more potent in the strips from As-exposed rats (49 +/- 5% increase) and less potent in normal rats (18 +/- 4% increase). Relaxation to the contractile agonists acetylcholine and thromboxane was depressed in As-exposed rat strips. These results show that, in contract on normal rats acetylcholine-induced relaxation is more prominent and thromboxane B2 more potent, presumably because of effects on airway smooth muscle regulation of contraction. This abnormal regulation may play an important role in the pathogenesis of As-induced lung disease.Q: Will a toilet replaceable water closet potentially be fitted with a new urn? My relatives have a toilet which is no longer functioning due to a leak from the cistern, after raising the toilet seat and lifting the cistern lid, water was leaking from the cistern, presumably from the area where the internal cistern pipe join the pipe outside the toilet (as
