It's a time that could soon come back to haunt the Democratic Party. Just two weeks ago, the president had in the legislative odds a budget deal that contained Obamacare, and a simple-but-significant income tax cut, as its backbone. Yet as a result, the left-leaning groups in Washington are losing their enthusiasm for a better healthcare system, and Republicans are winning their hearts. "The fact that ObamaCare is the law of the land is what makes the politics of healthcare so important," says Jeremy Bonner, a former head of healthcare policy for House Democrats. "If ObamaCare collapses, and there's no replacement, I don't see how a Republican could then run as an ObamaCare replacement." No, not really. Still, here's why the political dynamic is shifting, and why politicians and reform advocates are starting to worry that the Affordable Care Act's political prospects are looking worse by the day. The left is losing its enthusiasm for the Affordable Care Act. For years, the law was a lightning rod for the Democratic Party. Now that it has taken effect, though 6d1f23a050
