Starsector is an indie, space-faring 4X real-time strategy game by Chris Roberts and released on 10 June 2010. It features different perspectives for a game engine that has been in development since 2009. The basis of the universe and the Earth of the game are based on the NASA's JPL Horizons space probe. The JPL Horizons is a NASA spacecraft, which has orbited the planet of Pluto and now it is in an orbit around the Sun. When the game began, the spacecraft was 80 million kilometers from the Earth. Starsector is also based on Chris Roberts' Wing Commander/Freelancer series of science fiction video games. The science fiction genre of video games began with the original Wing Commander, released in 1991 by Chris Roberts. In the first series of games, the military genre was used to tie into the Wing Commander series, which were space games focusing on fighters in combat with enemy space ships. Starsector received critical acclaim upon release. Criticism of the game focused on the art, graphics, music and gameplay. The game's controller support was also praised, as it provides unique and useful features like holding the left and right triggers together to change the view of the game and holding two joysticks together to use mouse-like controls. Fan criticism has been directed at frequent glitches and server disconnects. Downloads, Reviews and Trailers

Starsector is a fast paced tactical 4X RTS. You start out as the captain of your ship with a small, basic army and attempt to dominate the galaxy. Your goal is to construct new worlds and systems to boost your population, gain an economic advantage, and build up your military. The game has a lot of effects that are unique to the 4X genre. The core gameplay consists of discovering and colonizing worlds, building resources and building units. Your units either construct new worlds, defend systems, or wage war against enemy planets. Starsector is a game that is on the '
