Disrupting Scepter quickly became the Magic equivalent of Batterskull, at least for a while. This is why you would sometimes see Mana Drain beat down card, even if you saw no reason to, just because it was the last they had to cast if an opponent played the top card of his deck. At one point on Magic Online I would see Disrupting Scepter used on turn one before any blue cards and it would be used almost every time blue played. Disrupting Scepter was a good choice for many games, but it took a while to realize this. If you play legacy you know that one of the fun parts of the game is that you can simply be the better player and your deck will usually win out. With formats like Standard being completely dominated by U/R or Pyromancer decks, playing a mono-blue or mono-red deck and simply winning every game was common and glorious. Legacy didn't have that. In Legacy, it was tough to get a serious storm deck going because they couldn't afford to use four-ofs at level one and they didn't have enough mana fixers to help them out. They didn't play black for Turn 1 cards because they didn't think they'd be casting as many shocks. They didn't play green for dual lands because they knew they wouldn't be playing many of the early removal spells. However, there were a few turns where a deck was unstoppable and the standard for it was that it was playing an Arcades Machine. These decks had acquired the dominant position in Legacy by building a simple, efficient deck and sticking to it. That's the thing about creatures; if you can beat them you are the king of Magic. That's the problem - not all decks can beat them and you need to know your limitations before you step in to try and make the problem your problem. If you're going to be winning most of your games, you are going to be responsible for making your opponent afraid to throw cards at you. If your opponent lets you, it's game over.

Years ago when the Nintendo Entertainment System came out, I played Mario Kart on it. But instead of that great Nintendo controller, I used a NES virtual reality gamepad emulator. I remember thinking that since the TV wasn't really for video games, I couldn't really fit the controller right into the screen. I thought it would feel off. But I was amazed that the controller worked so great. For some, they still prefer the old Nintendo controller to use in video games. 5ec8ef588b
