colleges have always understood that they have a need for students who have been tested, and that is why they exist. however, many colleges have also wanted a way for a prospective student to review the test prior to their application, so as to understand what is on the test. in my opinion, if a student does not understand what they are taking, they are not ready to apply for college yet. other benefits of college entrance exams are that they are an invitation to learn more about each applicant, and that they are procedures that allow admissions officers to accurately view who is fitting into the college community. in other words, a college is no longer just a place to go after you have finished high school, it is a place you go before high school if you want to be attracted to it. it is my goal to be able to help colleges have a way to competently access and review the test before they make a decision on acceptance or rejection. by establishing an exam review program, applicants can evaluate their test, and advise them as to how much additional work they need to prepare. there are many ways to evaluate the quality of an exam. one way is to look at what the questions look like. another is to look at the cognitive structure of the test. you have to not only understand the concepts on the test, you must also know how to apply those concepts to particular situations. other ways to evaluate an exam is to find out the questions that have been used in the test in the past to see if it matches the demands of the college you are applying to. you can also find out what questions are on the test today to see if they are a good representation of what college teachers are teaching.
