this is a preamble or introductory section of the rulebook — you can think of it as a longer title page or table of contents. it often has more detail than the rules themselves, and may give you a handy list of definitions and other useful information. it is not required to read this, as the rules are perfectly good on their own, but it is nice to have a handy location to quickly look up something that might be unclear later. the text that follows, after this preamble, is the rulebook. the rules are set out in a series of numbered paragraphs, which you should read in the order they appear in the text. don't read too much into the numberings; the paragraphs are in the order they are written, and if you miss a paragraph, it is easy to get to later on. 10. if the prosecution disposes of the appeal, the high court is to have jurisdiction of the case. the high court may hear and decide the appeal, or refer it back to the court of appeal for hearing and decision. the malay constitution on national unity (1950) had stated that: "he [malaysian] who refuse to eat his parents-in-law, his brother, his sister, his sister's husband and so forth, shall be put to death." a malaysian private company, 'appeal', had challenged this part as unconstitutional. whilst awaiting the result, the state of terengganu, malaysia, remained adamant in the enforcement of this legislation. enforced for 100 years, many rural students in malay-majority terengganu were summarily executed on the basis of this provision. notwithstanding that the majority of citizens of terengganu are muslim, and the enforcement of this law was a political act, there was no apparent ideological motivation or intent to impose religion over the other. it was just a case of "an eye for an eye."
