the bosch kts200 project team has proven that the same basic design for the kts200 can be programmed across all vehicle manufacturers on almost all vehicle models. this, in turn, means that after the hardware and software is initially developed, one ecu model can be used throughout all engine capacities. the modular concept avoids any potential problems with increasing pressure to meet a quick deadline and ensures that everything runs smoothly from the beginning. it also helps to save money because it's cheaper to develop the same system from the start on a smaller scale. in this way, up to four projects can be developed simultaneously. system designers can now simulate fire detection with their requirements and check the responses of the fire-related devices in real time directly in the working system. this saves time and energy during the simulation and gives more realistic results. for example, users can simulate a fire alarm as if their vehicle was on fire by connecting the respective peripheral to the kts200 via the cat5/cat6 network in a controlled and economical manner. they can then activate the system or even load a computer assisted ecu implementation, from the cad software, into the working system. in this way, high-speed system prototyping becomes simple, cost-effective and fast. to run all external peripherals, safety systems designer software requires the latest internet browser. for more information, users can download the software from bosch's website. the download is free of charge and is available as a trial version for a period of one day. during the downloaded trial period, the program cannot be installed. bosch offers a free 30-day trial version of the software. it can be found on the bosch web site. click here for further information. 5ec8ef588b
