i wasn't looking forward to the retooling of splatterhouse. it's been a long time since the series was at its best, and from the little i saw in the trailers, it seemed to be a complete re-envisioning of the series. they aren't taking any of the things that i liked about the original and throwing them out the window, and while they are obviously giving the series a good deal more polish, there isn't a lot here that is going to make me come back for more. where splatterhouse is lacking is with the gameplay. they're not as clueless about the genre as they were in the 90s, but they've certainly improved on a lot of the problems that were there. there's a lot of blood in splatterhouse (2010), and you will be splattered quite a bit, so it makes sense that splatterhouse (2010) doesn't have an r18 certificate. but that doesn't mean the gore is gratuitous. there's a design logic to the blood and guts. it's a game that wants to have its cake and eat it too. it wants to be incredibly gruesome, but at the same time, it wants to be fun, and it wants to be a game you can have fun with. if you want to see gore, you can do a lot of things that aren't a part of the game, and you're not being scammed. the developers aren't lying to you, and are just being extra careful about what you're seeing, because they care about the game, and don't want to have their own fun ruined by a silly man-child banning the game. there is a lot of blood in Splat House (2010), and you will be splattered quite a bit, so it makes sense that Splat House (2010) doesn't have an R18 certificate. but that doesn't mean the gore is gratuitous. there's a design logic to the blood and guts.
