Drone footage reveals New Zealand's most popular places for sports and other leisure activities. Researchers from Auckland University of Technology (AUT) used drones to scan and analyse New Zealand's most popular places for sports and other leisure activities. They found that in some areas, such as suburban parks, recreation spots were too spread out for a single person to enjoy them - people were forced to use cars to access sports or social facilities. They say their survey will be used to help guide the development of leisure and recreation services in the future. AUT student volunteer Jodie Phillips, who spearheaded the project, says leisure-time activity is in decline around the world. "That means an ever-increasing number of people will be living in less-accessible environments, or in areas where mobility is difficult or expensive." The researchers measured the air quality and noise levels at 67 sites around the country and found them to be "quite safe and enjoyable". They also recorded the number of people who visited each site over a period of three weeks. Their findings showed there was huge demand for recreation spots in the suburbs, but that central city green spaces did not have the same high demand as suburban spaces. The study showed there were higher demand for recreational spots around the North Island, in the Auckland region and along the Coromandel and Bay of Plenty coastlines. The survey showed there was strong demand for urban green spaces, such as parks and playgrounds, but not many other green spaces such as gardens or riverbanks. The researchers said the results could be used to guide the creation of new recreation areas and redesign of existing ones. "As New Zealand moves towards becoming a more urban nation, these findings will help us better understand what people value and need, and where they want to go, so the State and local government can plan and allocate more resources to provide accessible, green spaces," said Jodie. "It will also give government and planners an idea of the

Why was the css animation paused when i clicked a button on this website: When i click on a button on this website, the animation pauses. What is the cause of the animation pausing and also how do i avoid this problem? Is it related to CSS3? A: This is the default behaviour of (this particular) animation-play-state, which is what is used to animate the pause button. It uses a element which is a form of i-element from which the document does not have access to. If you wan't to avoid that behaviour and animate a pause button yourself, you can wrap the button you are animating in a preformatted element and target the form of the animation yourself. However, there are some browsers which do not support that.
